Easy Trace Free review: Easy Trace Free Review by Yacov LedererEnzyme immunodetection of trypsinogen and proceratogenic alpha 2-macroglobulin using a combination of ionic detergents and sodium dodecyl sulphate. Both enzyme-linked immunoabsorbent assay (ELISA) and hemagglutination-inhibition (HI) tests have been used to demonstrate the specific trypsinogen binding to the O-antigenic determinants of Salmonella O-group 9. Both tests were based on polystyrene-coated wells for enzyme-labelled antibody (ELISA) or on plastic 6-well microtiter plates (HI). In both tests, affinity purified antibody to trypsinogen was used in combination with one of various alpha 2-macroglobulins (alpha 2-M) and in various concentrations of NaCl (0.9--1.5 M) and Triton X-100 (0.01--1%). All tests gave similar results. Addition of as little as 0.3% Triton X-100 and 0.2% NaCl made the M antibody (1:500) in combination with O-group 9 antigen to bind stably to it. It was impossible to add Triton X-100 or NaCl as a separate step, or to repeat the reactions. However, when alpha 2-M was added to it in high concentrations of Triton X-100, the maximum M-trypsinogen complexes were obtained. The most stable complex was obtained with 10 mg/ml of alpha 2-M. The binding efficiency of the complex for O-group 9 antigen was maximal with 3 mg/ml alpha 2-M, but the stability of the complex was slightly decreased at this concentration. The stability of the complex was maximal with 0.4% NaCl.

We concluded that the process of labelling with enzyme and the subsequent use of sera of different animals for ELISA should be carried out in the presence of Triton X-100 and as high a concentration of NaCl as possible. Addition of Triton X-100 and NaCl made the M antibody and trypsinogen complexes stable and permitted reproducible results. Wine & Spirits From the wonderful "micro
