A few weeks ago I was invited to participate in a workshop presented by a conference on digital addiction called "Into the Abyss: A Critical Conference on Digital Addiction." It was an interesting look at how the relationship between technology and society is changing, and it included some very sobering points. Basically, the technology we have at our fingertips and use to understand and interact with the world is changing at a dizzying pace. Users are consuming more digital content than ever before, and that content is increasingly based on the virtual world of computer games and virtual reality. New technologies, like smartphones and tablets, are redefining how we interact and the role of digital content in our lives. I was struck, however, by how much I felt the workshop was a product of the way we live today in a consumerist society — as opposed to a product of the way society is changing. What's more, the workshop presented the digital experience as a problem, rather than as a part of the vast change of things in our lives today. On the one hand, I totally get why people feel a sense of alienation, loneliness and lack of community today. Our connections to those around us have become fractured, or if they are still present, they are virtual and can feel distant. We have spent decades of our lives busy trying to balance our time between the virtual and the real world, but it has left us feeling disconnected. Technology has taken the place of real life, and we feel that real life is missing. As with many things, social media is a part of this. Social media has not only become a way to connect with others, but it has become a way to understand ourselves. As the workshop pointed out, if the reason we go to social media is to interact with others, then that means there is a connection between us. Therefore, for many people, the feeling of social media as a place to connect is in a state of hyper-connection. But what happens when connections are no longer 09e8f5149f
