How could this actually work as a platform, compared to Android for instance? ~~~ wiredfool It's basically a wrapper for a web application, not a container for apps. During the reaction, the polyether chain was shown to be reduced by about 2 units, whereas the pendant OH groups were significantly less reactive with hydrogen atoms abstracting as indicated from the deconvoluted IR spectra. In that paper, the authors explained the inhibition of oxygen evolution by molybdenum(VI) on copper oxide surfaces by bonding of the sulfhydryl moiety of the enzyme to the molybdenum atom of the catalyst, which prevents the Mo atom from activating water. What I am trying to figure out is how are the Michael addition products of water reacted with the aldehyde. Aren't the Michael addition products of water too unstable to be observed? I.e. by the time they had been formed, there should be no aldehyde left. Maybe I am missing something obvious. Anybody? Wassaf PS. The work I mentioned above is by the Sienkiewicz lab.In digital signal processing, the first step of many processing operations is the conversion of an analog input signal into a digital representation thereof. To reduce the amount of hardware required to implement this step, many converters of the pulse code modulation (PCM) type utilize pipeline stages or architectures wherein the outputs of a stage serve as the input of a subsequent stage. If, for example, the converter is to convert 1,000 samples per second into a digital PCM signal, a typical architecture of the converter will provide 200 stages, each stage converting 50 samples per second into a digital signal. Although the sampling rate is thus divided into 200 parts, the time required to complete the conversion remains 1,000 times longer. To speed up the conversion process, it is known to provide a pipeline stage in which each one of a succession of samples is stored in a small capacity shift register and is summed with the output of the previous stage. Such a pulse code modulator of the parallel stage type generally requires a
