Specificity will be achieved by using genetically defined tumor cells as immunogens. The new antibodies will be used to detect human tumor antigens in tissues and in patients' sera. We will prepare monoclonal antibodies from the immunization of mice with human tumor cells. The newly developed antibodies will be used to study expression of tumor antigens in human cancers as well as in human tumors grown in experimental animals. Characterization of human tumors will be done to determine whether human tumors do express tissue antigens common to the antigens of murine tumors. An important application of these studies will be to develop methods of selecting patients for clinical trials using immunotherapy.Q: ReactJS - How to implement loading gif and update counter I am building a React-based web page. I want to display a spinner while loading data. When the data is retrieved, I want to display a message in the same component ("Success! Your profile has been updated."), which will show the new user information and be replaced by a loading animation. I'm new to React, and I've done a lot of Googling, but I can't find an easy way of achieving this. Can anyone help? A: I have successfully implemented this behavior into a ReactJs app. Most importantly, it involves creating a custom component called ComponentSpinner. Since you will be using your loader in a lot of components, I recommend making it a reusable component so you can use it in any component without passing in a state. Here is the ComponentSpinner.js: import React, { Component } from'react'; export default class ComponentSpinner extends Component { constructor(props) { super(props);
